Headmaster Ms. Deborah Holman

Class of 2015:

The 2014 - 2015 school year, your senior year, has been full of big events, not the least of which is your graduation from Brookline High. Thinking back fifty years ago, BHS students returned to school with National and world events swirling around them during the 1964 - 1965 school year. In 1964, the civil rights leader Martin Luther King, Jr. won the Nobel Peace Prize; the U.S. was increasing its military and diplomatic involvement in Vietnam; President Lyndon B. Johnson began his "Great Society" programs aimed at reducing poverty and racial injustice; the Beatles appeared for the first time in the U.S.; and the seeds were being sown locally for Boston's METCO program.

In your Brookline High senior year, 2014 - 2015, you experienced an equally grand and tumultuous time. Massachusetts' first African American governor, Deval Patrick, finished his eight years in office, while the state's first female U.S. Senator, Elizabeth Warren, continued her U.S. Senate tenure. Military conflict in the Middle East tested our hope hopes for a peaceful world. The racial unrest and events in Ferguson, Missouri, and most recently, Baltimore, Maryland have again challenged our notions of equality in modern America.

One of the main purposes of public education, perhaps the most important purpose, is to work at making sense of who we are as a democratic nation and community in light of the profound and weighty circumstances that surround us, be it 1965 or 2015. As a class, you have worked on that this year by helping lead the way on our Courageous Conversations school-wide discussion on racism, privilege, and bias; by re-energizing our annual MILK assembly and pointing it toward a theme of action; and by strengthening BHS's commitment to its Days of Dialogue and Silence in support of LGBTQ individuals. In addition, you have excelled in academics, social justice, community service, visual arts, performing arts, journalism, athletics, and many more areas. As individuals and as a graduating class, you have helped BHS continue to make sense of who we are as an evolving school community.

Thank you for your contributions to Brookline High. Congratulations and best of luck in all your future endeavors.

Sincerely

Deborah Holman
Headmaster

BROOKLINE PUBLIC LIBRARY

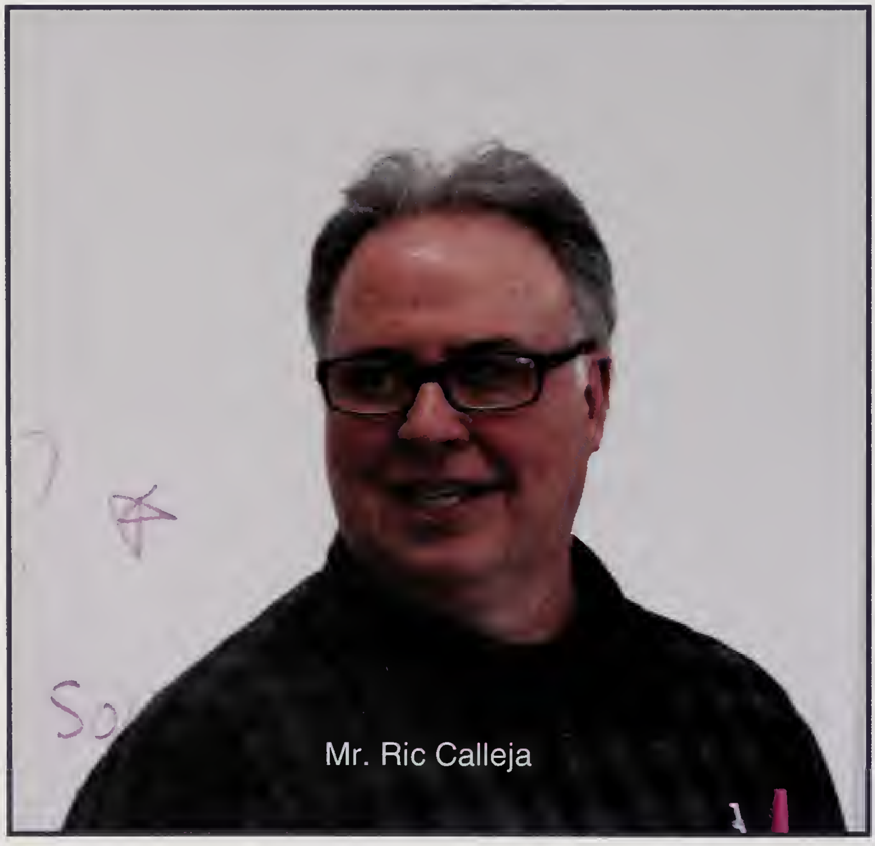
The class of 2015 celebrates these teachers for 141 years of dedicated service....

Ms. Abby Erdmann

Thank you Abby for dedicating forty two years of your life to School Within A School and Brookline High School. You have inspired so many people with your resilience, kindness, and compassion. You have taught us how to be critical of our actions and the world around us. You have showed us how to love and to live life to the fullest. You have made a permanent mark on SWS and BHS and the hearts of us all. We know that you will do the same in Costa Rica. You will be greatly missed, but your presence will remain on the fourth floor.

Love SWS

This yearbook is dedicated to you all !



Mr. Ric Calleja

Mr. Calleja has been the singing soul of the Spanish department for thirty years. His booming voice and jolly laugh have enchanted students and colleagues like no one else can or will. No teacher better represents the joy of learning a world language than Mr. Calleja, who also offered a daily poem to the staff throughout the month of April. Mr. Calleja's uniquely Cuban and upbeat, optimistic personality have added the grace of good humor and humanity to Brookline High.

Scott Butchart

Thank You !

The class of 2015 is proud to dedicate this year's yearbook to Ms. Ellen Lewis, a standard-bearer in the English department. Whether she is diving deep into A Tale of Two Cities or into a grammar lesson, students value Ms. Lewis' seriousness and excitement. Her high standards have shocked many a freshmen, but her rigor and support go on to pay huge dividends. Hundreds of players blossomed under her philosophy, as a volleyball coach, that all seeds do grow. To her colleagues, she is known as " the oracle" and the path to her desk is well-worn, as new and veteran teachers have sought Ms. Lewis' encouragement and expertise. She is a great listener and problem solver, and students, former players, and colleagues will always be grateful for the time she took to push us hard and coach us every step of the way.

Marcella

Enjoy your Graduation from BHS.

As a coach you won 300 games, but as a teacher you care more about the 200 or so students you see each semester; as a coach, the freshmen are scared to try out for varsity until your current players tell what a teddy bear you really are, but as a teacher you are the one who those same freshmen you have in class come to in times of crisis or need, and as graduates come through a crowded lunchroom for a big hug.

As a colleague, you have affected the lives of us all, Keith Thomas insists that there is nobody in the department whose life has't been touched by you in some way. Your quiet (ahem) way makes people laugh out loud and the respect afforded you by all teachers, young and veteran, has been earned through years of listening and putting others (including kids) first. You work with everyone to build strong relationships and meaningful bonds. As a coach, as a teacher, as a colleague you are among the few remaining beacons of what it meant to be an educator. You certainly rank above any "deacon" no matter the organization... and you are nothing if not FIRST CLASS each and every day!

Portraits of BHS

Photographer posts students' stories aiming to encourage self-appreciation

BERTINA XUE
Staff Writer

Since the Facebook page Humans of New York began in 2011, it has amassed 11 million "likes" by featuring pictures of anonymous strangers and highlighting the fascinating stories they carry around with them. For junior Jaime Serrato-Marks, this project inspired him to start a page of his own: Portraits of BHS.

"I think that the problem is people put up their best photos on the internet so they'll either make themselves look bad on purpose, or they'll show their very best," Serrato-Marks said. "I'm trying to just get simple, just what you look like on a daily basis. I don't want them to cover their faces with makeup and put on their best outfit. I want what they look like normally. I want just them."

Serrato-Marks said that he usually begins his process by approaching a student and asking if they would like to be featured on the page. Then he takes a number of pictures of them, and concludes the process by conducting an interview, which he records. Sometimes he will contact the student afterwards to ask further questions.

Freshman Yama Estime said she had a little trouble choosing a fitting picture for her quote after she was interviewed, but was eventually able to decide on one that she felt showed who she really was.

"He asked me after he interviewed me which picture I liked that matched what I talked about, and I chose this one that had nothing to do with what I was talking about," Estime said. "Then he said, 'No, use this one; it helps more.' I like the picture. It actually brings out the Yama in me!"

Junior Ján Simonds said the question, "What is your greatest struggle right now?" caught him off guard in his interview for Portraits.

"It kind of took me for a loop. I was not prepared to answer that," Simonds said.

According to Serrato-Marks, he almost always begins an interview with that question in order to see how open the interviewee is and to draw out their own personal experiences.

"For some people, you can ask that first question and they'll tell you their deepest, darkest secret, and that's great," Serrato-Marks said. "Some people will just tell you about school, or they'll just tell you about getting better at time management, and almost everybody says that. So I kind of work from there, and I try to get a story because if I asked people about religion, school or things that they've been taught, they will have similar answers to other people just in the fact that they have had a teacher. It's rare for someone to get completely on their own political beliefs or religious beliefs, so I like to just get a story."

Serrato-Marks said asking the right questions takes practice.

"Nobody asks about the time you contemplated suicide in a regular conversation," he said. "Nobody asks about your hardest moments. They're hard questions, and a lot of the time, I tell people that I'll ask a lot of questions and if you just can't answer them don't worry about it and I'll just keep going."

According to Serrato-Marks, interview lengths depend completely on the person. Interviews can last from 30 seconds to 30 minutes, though almost all of them are five minutes long.

"The first thing they say that catches my attention, that really want to hear more about or I just think I want to put that up immediately. I use," he said.

Serrato-Marks said it is impossible to describe what type of quote catches his attention because of the distinctness of each portrait.

"I try to just use unique stories because like I said, beliefs are common," he said. "People have very similar beliefs sometimes, but when you hear someone tell you about an experience, that's really rare. That's something only they can tell you about. Something only that person can tell you about."

Simonds said that while he didn't know what would be a fitting answer for Serrato-Marks' question, in the end he felt good about it.

"I think I got lucky because I was so confused about what he was asking me. I gave a very confused answer which ended up being what he posted, and ended up being kind of funny," Simonds said.

According to Serrato-Marks, one of the issues he deals with when a student says no to his request for an interview is usually the student's self-esteem.

"When it's a 'No,' the two answers are: 'I don't look good today' or 'I don't look good in pictures,' and 'I won't say something interesting,'" Serrato-Marks said. "That pisses me off because it really upsets me that people think they're not beautiful and that they don't think they are interesting. I have never come across a person when I'm interviewing them who I am not intrigued by, who I don't get something that really catches my attention."

According to Serrato-Marks, besides being a place where students put up their best and worst photos, social media should also be a place where discussion takes place.

"I want everyone who has been on Portraits to have a good experience with it, especially because on Humans of New York, a lot of the comments get nasty," Serrato-Marks said. "That's what I'm most afraid of. I want there to be more discussion and for people to talk about what they think about things, but I really hope no one gets hurt."

A Day in the Life: Christien Polos

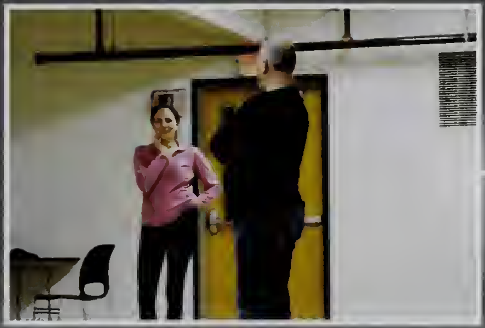
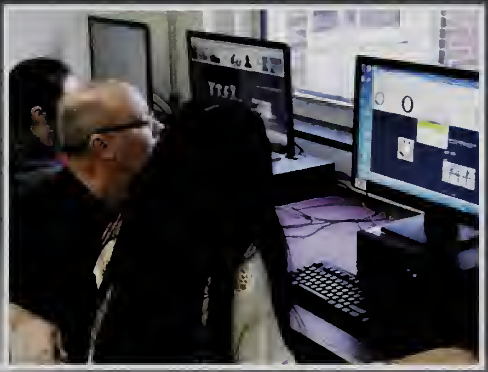
Written by Tony Ji & Cleo Falvey



8:20 a.m.

Performing arts teacher, Christien Polos, begins his day with an independent study dance student, senior Hannah Weighart. Polos helps Weighart prepare to perform in the upcoming dance show, Progressions, by suggesting she spend more of the performance executing moves closer to the ground. Polos, an experienced choreographer, also mentors Weighart through her job as the assistant choreographer for this year's musical.



9:05 a.m.

Polos arrives in the Library Lab and begins preparing the room for the Arts Infusion Lab with students in the Opportunity For Change program. As the students trickle in, Polos prompts them to continue work on designs for a mural that will hang in the OFC hallway. Polos helps students come up with designs that are the result of self-reflection, including words that describe their motivation to join the OFC program. Then, the students begin searching for images and designs they would like to see on the mural.

11:10 a.m.

Choreography class begins with students stretching and warming up independently. Students practice steps from the routines they have created for their choreography projects. The project, which is called "Learn from the Masters," requires students to select a famous choreographer to study and then create a dance based on the choreographer's movements. This is the final day of class before break, and the students are presenting their projects to the rest of the class. After each small group finishes performing, other students chime in with compliments and constructive criticism. Polos praises the dance of a specific group, based on choreographer Bob Fosse, telling them their dance has improved dramatically since the last time the students presented.

Students arrive at Polos' G-block beginners dance class, which is currently two weeks into its tap dancing unit. Polos said he has collected shoes over many years in order to have enough for each member of the class to borrow some. Polos talks to a student who has lost one of the metal bottoms, or taps, on their tap shoe. He then leads a guided warm up from the front of the room. Students warm up for tap dance by practicing simple routines, which lead to more complex rhythms while lively jazz music plays in the background. Polos waves his arms in the direction they are tapping to help guide students. After the warm-up, students split up into smaller groups to practice their routine to the song "Walking My Baby Back Home," by Nat King Cole. After the groups perform, Polos applauds and suggest they focus on tapping more carefully to make a synchronized sound. Students then break into even smaller groups of two to four people and work on their own creative pieces. Polos walks around the room, frequently checking in with individuals to make sure everyone in the group influences the creative process, while offering suggestions for how to make the pieces better.

3:04 p.m.

After school, Polos leads practice for this year's musical, "Hairspray." Two boys stand at the center of the room singing and dancing along with a recorded tape. Polos gives suggestions on the steps to the dance. Then, the cast progresses through the rest of the musical from the beginning. Polos focuses on guiding junior Talia Roland-Kalb, who plays the lead role of Tracy, through the steps for the song "Good Morning Baltimore." He also asks the other cast members to get into character and to add more excitement to the scene by acting like they are doing their hair.

Teachers see merit in optional book

SARAH GLADSTONE
News Editor

Starting last school year, 11th grade English teachers were given a new choice: whether or not to teach "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn."

This choice resulted from a curriculum change. Previously, all juniors read "Death of a Salesman," "The Great Gatsby," "Song of Solomon," and "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn." Now teachers can pick any three of these books.

Despite this choice, all 11th grade teachers have taught or plan to teach "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" this year, with the exception of Rachel Reagan and co-teachers Pete Rittenberg and Anthony Meyer, who have not decided yet.

The change was made because 11th grade English teachers felt reading all four books was too time-consuming, especially for standard-level courses, English Curriculum Coordinator Mary Burchenal said.

English teacher Nicholas Rothstein said he believes teachers need to thoroughly consider whether reading this book is worth the emotional impact it may have on their students.

"Any teacher who thinks, hands down, this is an American classic and all kids need to know this," Rothstein said, "has not taught it enough to black and brown children and looked into their eyes as they are reading the n-word over and over."

Rothstein's own reasons for teaching the book have evolved. In the past, he has thought that the book should not be taught.

"I don't know that we need to teach it for some sort of skill or some sort of literary importance but it's important now because it's so ingrained in our culture. I would argue we teach it because it's a cultural landmark," he said. "I taught it this year because I'm at that point now, in the weird twist of my own hypocrisy, that I teach it because going off to college without that knowledge might be damaging too."

Junior Elijah Elmore, who is the only African-American student in Rothstein's A-block American Literature Honor course, said Rothstein prepared them well for reading the n-word by incorporating seminars, PowerPoint presentations and discussions about its use as well as about race in general.

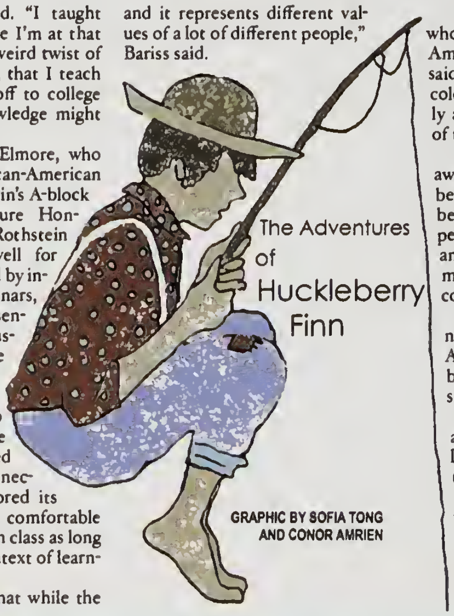
According to Elmore, because Rothstein only used the n-word when necessary and monitored its use, he mostly felt comfortable with it being said in class as long as it was in the context of learning.

Elmore said that while the book sparked interesting conversations, it was sometimes awkward.

"Sometimes if we got into deeper conversations about race, a lot of people would kind of look to me to see what my opinion was, instead of other peoples' opinions," he said.

Junior Kaija Bariss, who is also in Rothstein's A-block class, said she thinks the book should be taught at the high school.

"It's an American classic and it represents different values of a lot of different people," Bariss said.



GRAPHIC BY SOFIA TONG AND CONOR AMRIEN

Like Rothstein, English teacher Rob Primmer is teaching the book this year. Primmer said he embraces the discomfort that reading this book involves.

"Education isn't always comfortable," Primmer said. "There are moments when it's important to understand what is causing tension: 'Why do I feel this way? How do I give voice to it in some way?' And the conversations about the tension are important."

Junior Ryan Cullinane, who is in Primmer's F-block American Literature class, said the lack of students of color in the class negatively affects class discussions of the book.

"It takes something away from the discussion because it ends up just being a bunch of white people talking about race and that's not always the most interesting or best conversation," he said.

Like Bariss, Cullinane said reading "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" is crucial for students.

"It's a very important piece of American literature and I don't think we could have the English curriculum without it," he said.

Reagan said she chose not to teach the book last year after taking a poll in her classes. She has not yet decided if she will teach the book this year and said she wants to gauge her classes' interest before making a decision.

Like Primmer, English teacher Sarah Westbrook said she likes how "The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn" forces the class to have difficult conversations. She said she thinks students are able to gain a lot from reading the book.

"I think that they take away more articulate and nuanced ideas about what some of the prevalent stereotypes about African-Americans were at the time," Westbrook said. "I think they are able to explain satire in a more sophisticated way and analyze some of the writing techniques that go into satire and I think that it does force them to think about whether our society has changed, whether Huck changes at all and if that is satisfying to them or not."

At the end of the unit, Westbrook holds a structured debate about whether or not the book should be taught at the high school.

"It's a relevant question because it's a book that can really shut students down," Westbrook said. "Especially, if it's the only book you've read in high school where you have a black character, I think that's when it's a problem."

OPINIONS ON DRESS CODE

Professional dress keeps focus on learning

ALISA CONNER
World Language Teacher

Every so often, usually in a period of warm weather, an email conversation surfaces among the staff about what students are wearing, or not wearing, or what body parts are showing.

Imagine our awkwardness: Many of us feel uncomfortable with students' body parts hanging out in our classrooms but feel even more uncomfortable approaching students about it.

We love our culture of student freedom and self-expression. We don't really have a shared practice of requiring or prohibiting certain kinds of dress. But aren't there some lines we should be drawing?

Of course, we are mostly talking about girls' body parts here (although a few years ago when the boys' varsity crew team showed up in their pink skin tight racing spandex, that definitely inspired some consternation). The way I see it, there are three factors at work here.

The first I call the professional-ish factor. Just as different kinds of language are appropriate in different settings, the same is true with dress. I know some of you wear pajamas to school sometimes, but, in general, school approximates a work setting rather than a home, beach, mall or nightclub setting.

I'm completely comfortable with the grown-ups in the community declaring that appropriate dress means professional-ish dress, because this is an institution explicitly dedicated to academic, professional-ish stuff.

This means we should cover up undergarments and most body parts, particularly ones that are sexualized in our culture. I personally also try not to wear my most raggedy stuff.

The professional factor is related to the distraction factor. Let's face it, the real issue here is sex.

Of course, if you wear T-shirts advertising alcohol brands or other mind-altering substances, teachers should call you out on it. Just don't do that. But where it gets more difficult is the sex part.

You all are adolescents and hopefully your sexuality, whatever that means for you, is awakening in a safe and healthy way. It's also okay if you're not exploring that part of you yet.

The point is, you all have hormones and they are bouncing around the hallways and classrooms, so it would help us all better focus on our professional-ish stuff if we made this place slightly less distracting.

However, savvy adolescents have asked the very excellent question: why it is that female body parts are the ones mostly in question here? And why should we women have the burden of shielding whoever might be attracted to those body parts from their own hormones and distractedness? Why is it somehow our fault if others get offended/distracted/attracted, and why is it our responsibility to cover up?

This brings me to the complicated-gender-rules-in-our-society factor. It's not cool that women get blamed for attracting unwanted attention and violence against us. It's cool for young women to feel comfortable and at home in their bodies and sexuality. I get the argument that gender-flavored dress codes can be considered sexist.

But I think the story of sexism doesn't end here.

Why do we define women's attractiveness in the ways that we do? Why is it so important for young women to worry about attractiveness anyway? And why is it that women are supposed to show body parts or undergarments in order to be attractive to men?

I don't quite buy the argument that when young women display their bodies it's only about their own empowerment. Because why is women's power defined as sexual in the first place?

Here, it helps to refer to our culture's long history of limiting women's power to the realms of sex and the home.

I have nothing against celebrating female sexual power as positive, but I don't think that by itself is enough to challenge the roots of sexism or rape culture.

Some forms of dress may be taking away from the "professional-ish" atmosphere of the high school and distracting students from their academics, according to Alisa Conner.

Instead, I'd rather we all work to expand our notions of female power to include intellectual, economic, political and artistic empowerment. And, while we're at it, let's expand our notions of masculinity to include more than athleticism, hyper-sexuality and emotional cluelessness-I dare say those gender rules are just as limiting and inaccurate.

Obviously, we have made great strides in this realm. No one goes around Brookline telling young women they have to be homemakers. But the sort of sexism that causes us to limit how we see women and women's potential power is not so easily dismissed.

I have a seven-year-old daughter who is fierce and feisty and creative. But already she's been swallowed up by Disney princess and Barbie culture. What she wants to be when she grows up is beautiful.

Isn't that sad? She's already coming to believe that the most important thing about her is how she looks. No one is telling her overtly that her surest ticket to feeling powerful and good about herself is the appearance of her body, but she's picking up those messages nonetheless.

I don't believe we are free of those messages in high school either. Our pop culture relentlessly promotes a certain kind of sexual expression as the key to power and happiness, and I do believe that whether or not we want them to, those messages can limit how (heterosexual) boys see girls, and yes, how girls see themselves and their options for feeling powerful.

I want school to be a place where my daughter and all women can be relatively free of the pressure to display themselves that way, so we can concentrate on developing other parts of ourselves and cultivating other kinds of power.

Ladies, feel free to dress however you want after school, on the weekend, on the street. Gentlemen, if you want your boxers to hang out your rear outside of school, I'm not going to be offended even if I don't particularly enjoy the view.

But in school, I ask that we remember that this is a professional-ish environment in which we aim to develop our intellects, creativity and critical thinking first and foremost, as free of distraction and limiting cultural pressures as possible.

Restrictive dress code enforces gender inequality

JARED SHANKS
Contributing Writer

I was a stripper this Halloween. I wore a bright green, sparkly vest. It was tight and short and showed a little stomach. It accentuated my chest, revealing enough to entice customers. I wore tight black leggings: like dress pants, but better on the butt.

Some people may say that's not too out of the ordinary, but others have issues with that costume. Maybe they think it is bad to represent a profession they deem unrespectable. Maybe they think it is shameful that someone would show so much skin at school. Maybe they think it is distracting to other students. Maybe they see Halloween as the wrong day to make a statement.

I was not the only person that day who wore a sexual costume. The number of things that have the word "sexy" is deplorable. Sexy Santa, sexy ebola containment suit, sexy you name it, it's probably been brought to that level.

Although I may have not been the only one in a sexy costume, I was among a minority. I was male. I still am actually, but I was one of the few men that day wearing a revealing costume.

Normally, when a sexy costume is put on display, people get offended. People say it's distracting that she's wearing such a short skirt or that it's unprofessional to have so much chest showing. Often, even on normal days, girls are called out in public by people who have something to say about how they are showing their bodies. This is purported to be a dress code.

My statement, and experiment, was to see if I would get "dress coded" for wearing something which would have gotten a girl sent home. I wasn't.

Teachers laughed and joked about what I was wearing. I walked through the hallways and talked to teachers. I even walked into the middle of the cafeteria and made a scene, playing "Careless Whisper' in the style of the sexy sax man. Yet no one said anything to me about my clothing.

I was never told I was being distracting. In fact, it wasn't until after school that I even heard that I might have made one of my teachers uncomfortable, and that my director told me that I should put on more clothes. It is clear that, were I female, I wouldn't have made it through a class without a teacher talking to me about my dress.

It all comes back to the idea that when women dress up they look like sluts, but when men dress nicely they look sexy. So it is not okay for a woman to dress provocatively, yet when a man does, it's so abnormal that it becomes a joke.

This double standard is perpetuating a gender binary and institutionalized sexism. My statement was an attempt to show that things like our dress code can reinforce the obnoxious and pointless divide we have created between the sexes.

THOMAS HENNESSEY

Cypress Field renamed in honor of Brookline legend

BY SETH COVEN Managing Editor

When Tina Hennessey was in college at Cornell University, she played on the womens lacrosse team. Every day when she had a game, her father, Thomas Hennessey, woke up at 4 a.m., hopped in his car and made the six hour trek on I-90 to Ithaca, New York to see his daughter play.

All three of his daughters, Tina, Sara and Maria, played varsity sports at Ivy League schools. Thomas Hennessey rarely missed any of their games.

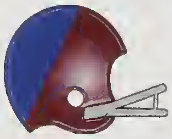
"He was just the best dad you could ever hope for," Tina Hennessey said. "He gave myself and my sisters the best life ever. He was a great person."

In addition to being a dedicated husband and father, Thomas Hennessey is widely recognized as one of the greatest athletes to ever walk through the doors of the high school, and also for his contributions to the Town of Brookline. In 2012, at the age of 71, he passed away after a battle with cancer. In honor of his legacy, the fields outside the high school on Cypress Street were renamed the Thomas P. Hennessey Athletic Fields at Cypress Street Playground.

Hennessey captained the football, basketball and track and field teams at the high school and was named an All-Scholastic in both his junior and senior year in football. He was inducted into the Brookline High School Hall of Fame in 1994.

"He was one of the best that's ever gone to Brookline High without question," Ed Schluntz, former Athletic Director and one of Hennessey's coaches, said. "We just loaded him with responsibility, and he was able to do it all because he was so smart and so quick."

After graduating from high school, Hennessey was awarded a full scholarship for football and track and field at the College of the Holy Cross, Schluntz said. In his first play with the football team, Hennessey received the opening kickoff at Harvard Stadium and returned it for a touchdown against the Crimson.



In 1963, Hennessey received the Holy Cross Crusader of the Year award for his outstanding achievements as a student-athlete. Hennessey volunteered a year of his life while at Holy Cross to becoming a teacher and physical education instructor at the Jesuit College in Baghdad, Iraq. When he came back, he spent another year serving as assistant to the Dean of Men at the school.

"He did it all and he chose to do it all," Tina Hennessey said. "He chose to take the time to give back to all the things that were important to him."

After graduating from Holy Cross and playing a year of semi-professional football, Hennessey went on to play defensive back for the Boston Patriots. He was named the Patriots Rookie of the Year in 1965 and recorded eight interceptions in the two seasons he played for the team, including two against Hall of Fame Quarterback Joe Namath.

Jack Kendrick, a longtime friend of Hennessey, said Hennessey never sought glory or praise, even with all the attention his athletic prowess attracted.

"Even from high school, with all the publicity he got, he always deflected it and was extremely humble," Kendrick said. "He always seemed to have this attitude that he was blessed with his athletic and intellectual skills."

Joe Davis, a former teammate of Hennessey at Brookline, agreed his humility was one of his defining characteristics.

"Everything he did he approached the same way: straightforward, head on, get the job done, don't be looking around for recognition," Davis said.

Hennessey pursued a four-decade-long career in education in the Boston school system after retiring from the Patriots. He was a coach and administrator at Brighton High School and was also named headmaster at Madison Park High School at the same time United States District Court Judge Arthur Garrity instituted forced busing in Boston.

According to Kendrick, the school was around 75 percent minority at the time, and Hennessey worked to ensure that all his students received an equal education and that there was no trouble in his facilities.

"That was absolute mayhem, and Tom was in charge of a school that was right in the middle of it," Davis said. "He did an exemplary job."

Hennessey continued his legacy of civic engagement by becoming the only person in the history of Brookline to serve as both the Chairman of the School Committee and the Board of Selectmen. When Proposition 2.5 was passed in 1980, the Brookline school department had to cut its budget by 20 percent. According to Kendrick, Hennessey was credited with steering the town through the budgetary constraints and protecting many of the school system's core programs.

On top of his commitment to athletics, education, politics and raising three girls, Hennessey served as a surrogate father to James Thornton's three children after Thornton, a boyhood friend of Hennessey's, passed away at the age of 46. He also helped establish the James M. Thornton Memorial Scholarship for students at Northeastern in honor of his friend, according to Davis.

"It's a crazy statement, but I cannot think of a flaw in Tom Hennessey," Davis said. "I'm sure there are some, but none that I'm aware of."

After Hennessey's death, Kendrick and Davis started a campaign to rename the field after him.

"I did not want to see his name and his legacy to the town just drift into the background," Kendrick said.

Kendrick's and Davis' initial proposal to the Brookline Parks and Recreation Department was unanimously disapproved.

However, Kendrick said support from former Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis, New England Patriots owner Robert Kraft, and Chairman of New Balance Jim Davis energized the renaming process. Kendrick and Davis also received backing from former selectmen Donna Kalikow, Mike Merrill, Joe Geller and Bob Allen, who came forward to lead the political approval process. The final approval came at Town Meeting on Nov. 18 after a 207-1 vote. The dedication ceremony and unveiling of the new park name took place at the Roberts-Dubbs Auditorium on Nov. 28.

"We went through a very long process, but it all was worth it in the end," Davis said. "The result is great. His name will be remembered in town forever."

In addition to renaming the field, Kendrick, Davis, and Mike Hennessey, Thomas' brother, are in the process of launching the Thomas P. Hennessey scholarship, which two Brookline High School students will receive each year. They are planning a road race in April to raise money for the fund.

"It's just amazing that there's going to be some permanent symbol of his life and his contributions to Brookline," Tina Hennessey said. "Every single day I think about him. I miss him every day."

The Tough Decision: Balancing SPORTS and ARTS

JULIANA KAPLAN & ASHLEY LEE

When senior Rachel Hechinger participated in the Student-Directed Play Festival while on the girls varsity tennis team her freshman year, she found herself in a dress rehearsal with her costume over her tennis clothes.

"That is definitely not something I would ever recommend because it was crazy to do," she said.

According to Hechinger, the only reason she was able to participate in both activities was because both commitments were not very strict. She told her coach in advance what matches and practices she would have to miss, and the Student-Directed Play Festival was very low-pressure, she said.

"You could never do that with something like Shakespeare," Hechinger said.

She participated in the Shakespeare play during her sophomore year and has taken several performing arts courses at the high school, including Needs Improvment this year. She has also been on the girls varsity tennis team since freshman year and trains and competes in tournaments year-round.

Hechinger said that, in general, you have to pick just one commitment in order to balance athletic interests with performing arts.

"Obviously, I chose tennis," she said. "For shows like Shakespeare, I couldn't play tennis during that time and I realized that although I love theater, I really wanted to devote a lot of my time to athletics. I thought that I could make a bigger impact through tennis."

Other students who participate in both athletics and performing arts have experienced similar situations.

Senior Kako Yamada has been on the girls varsity soccer team for one year and currently takes the drama courses BETCo and Needs Improvment. She is also performing in this year's spring play.

"Classes aren't as big a problem as plays," Yamada said. "One thing that did happen this year is that I had a pretty important match for soccer. It was the Newton North game, a night game. It happened to conflict with a BETCo showcase at the parents' night."

Fortunately, Yamada was able to compete in the soccer game without much of a problem. This was a rare case since students in Needs Improvment sign a contract at the beginning of the year, committing to be at every performance.

"But I wasn't in BETCo from the beginning of the year because of a scheduling conflict, so I actually hadn't gotten that contract," she said.

Regardless, Yamada said there are performing arts commitments she wishes she could have made but could not, due to her athletic interests.

"I never did Shakespeare here at the high school because of soccer, even though I wanted to," she said. "So that was a one-or-the-other situation, and that was unfortunate."

Senior B Mast has had the opposite dilemma. Mast has been in several school productions and is currently a part of Camerata and is the captain of Needs Improvment. His only significant association with sports during his time at the high school, besides attending games, is his involvement in the futsal team Brookline Flamingos, Mast said. Futsal is not a school-affiliated sport at the high school and requires a once-a-week commitment for several weeks during the winter.

"I kind of wish I had played a sport. I think I would like crew," he said. "I always thought theater has always been more important to me at least, and I'm never going to be a professional athlete, but I am aiming to be a professional actor. So that's kind of where my intention has been, and that's what's been my focus, although I love playing sports."

So far, Hechinger said that trying to balance her tennis commitments with her Needs Improvment commitments has not been much of a problem. However, she does not yet know what her schedule for tennis will be when the season begins.

"I don't know how it's going to go in the spring," she said. "I think it might get a little dicey."

Students train for spring marathon

LEON YANG
Staff Writer

Top: Senior Jeremy Spiro runs around the Brookline Reservoir. Bottom: Members of the Dreamfar marathon club train all year long to run the Providence marathon.

It is a crisp Thursday afternoon in November, a time when the weather shifts from mildly pleasant to bitterly cold. At the Brookline Reservoir, a few distant figures diligently run laps around the pond, alone or with a partner. These are members of the Dreamfar Club, and for them, it is time to begin training for something only approximately one percent of individuals have managed to complete: a marathon.

The prospect of accomplishing the seemingly insurmountable feat of running 26.2 miles intimidates many. However, the club fosters a welcoming environment in which runners can grow not only as athletes, but also as strong individuals.

This club is geared toward students who may have had little or no running experience before joining, such as junior David Kim. He said he joined the club because he wanted to participate in an after school activity and his friends were members of the club.

Kim said running with the club has encouraged him to work more efficiently on schoolwork and distracts him from the bustling and sometimes overwhelming routine of high school.

"There were times when I got bad grades, and I didn't really want to run. But after I ran, my mind was off school, and I felt better," Kim said.

Another one of the 18 newcomers of the club is senior Gregory Williams. Williams plays hockey at a varsity level but has never run extensively. However, the Dreamfar club enticed him.

"I really like that idea because it was kind of like, I can leave BHS knowing that I ran 26.2 miles," Williams said.

Williams also said he enjoys the group dynamic of the club and the chemistry between different members. Runners support each other and do not chastise one another for not running as far, he said.

"It's really not an environment where it's strict rules. It's taking what the runner does best and then building on it," Williams said. "That's kind of how progress works. You take what you do and take it one more step forward."

Williams also said that the progression of training has taught him lessons that he has applied to his own life.

"It kind of told me when you finish something that's hard, it's always probably better to do something that's more challenging because it's always better to go beyond your limit," Williams said.

Science teacher Elsbeth Leslie, who has served as the coach and adviser of the club for four years, said that a teacher from a different high school came up with the idea of starting a marathon club ten years ago.

"A teacher at Newton South was working with some of her students, and she herself was running a marathon and just looking at all the gifts it was giving her and the great things she was getting from it, and decided, 'Wow, this would be really great for my students,'" Leslie said.

The club has since spread to the high school. Currently, the 28 members are training to run in the Providence marathon in the first weekend of May. Runners meet three times during the week. On Saturdays, they run with the 11 other schools that participate in the Dreamfar High School Marathon program, Leslie said.

According to Leslie, the club is flexible and allows students to participate in other programs that appeal to their other interests.

"It just allows more flexibility for those students who want to do some different things," Leslie said. "And it takes away the stress. There have been students who've done organized sports, and then come to us and say, 'I love that I can run at the pace that I want to run at and there's not that competition aspect."

Runners begin a gradual progression in order to work toward their goal of running the marathon, Leslie said.

"The first couple of weeks we do a mile, and then we build up to a mile and a half, and then two, and then two and a half, and you keep going that way," Leslie said.

Senior Shahar Ganani said that mentally preparing for the marathon is crucial. Ganani completed the Providence marathon last year and is currently in her second year on the club.

"Honestly, the only thing you need, not the biggest thing, the only thing you need is the will to want to do it," Ganani said.

Ganani said training to run a marathon should not be deterred by a lack of self-confidence, nor should a runner be hesitant to join because they are reluctant to run long distances.

"I managed to finish a marathon in a fairly okay time, after being at zero," Ganani said. "So to anyone who tells me that 'I can't run,' yeah, I couldn't either, still really can't. But I'm still doing it."

In addition, Ganani recognizes that the process of training for a marathon has made her a stronger individual, and she has gained more confidence in herself to achieve anything she puts her mind to.

"It kind of teaches you that you can do anything," Ganani said. "Like you did a marathon? Let's conquer this test in chemistry!"

And perhaps that's what the true intention of the Dreamfar Club is. According to Leslie, the message of the club is to instill in runners a sense of their full potential.

"It's really the idea that through goal setting and having this great goal for a marathon, that you take it to an analogy in life that you can achieve and do anything," Leslie said.

Dreamfar meets after school Mondays, Wednesdays and Thursdays, and 8 a.m. on Saturday mornings.

kind of an indescribable feeling, so that's really amazing," Ockene said.

Ockene, also admires the sport because she finds it artistic.

"You're not just focused on landing a jump or scoring a goal; you're not just focused on that one thing. You're focused on all of the artistry in between and how graceful you have to be connecting the moves," Ockene said.

Welch, on the other hand, was not always interested in ice skating. She was first brought to a rink by her friend, Nanae Osawa, who begged Welch to take ice skating classes with her. Welch agreed and has since fallen in love with the sport.

"We would go out public skating all the time, and I would see her spinning and doing her jumps on the ice," Welch said. "It was really amazing to me because back then I could barely stand up on my skates. To be able to do that took a lot of strength and balance, so I wanted to be able to soar through the air like that."

Although ice skating may be an intense sport, Baseman said she would not stop.

"I would take a break from it and do gymnastics or dance, but I would just come back to skating because I love it," Baseman said.

Karate Kids

Kata, literally meaning forms, are a set sequence of karate moves requiring speed and precision required by karatekas, practitioners of karate. They are usually made up of kihon, or the basics of karate. Kumite, or sparring, is the combination of basic techniques and more complex forms against an opponent.

> If I were alone, I wouldn't have had the motivation I had with my sister doing it next to me. It got me motivated to compete. She usually trains next to me or around me.
> Moe Wakai, sophomore

This past October, senior Akane Wakai and sophomore Moe Wakai both competed for the U.S. international team in the Shoto Cup, an international karate competition held in Tokyo, Japan. Both siblings competed in separate rounds of sparring and forms. Akane Wakai placed 7th internationally in the forms competition.

"It was my first time competing against people my age, and it was really neat to see people my age, high school girls, who take it as seriously as I do and even more seriously sometimes," Akane Wakai said. "That was really inspiring because a lot of times I just train with people who are older and more experienced."

The sisters have trained for three and a half years at the Japan Karate Association of Boston. Due to the low number of high school athletes who take the sport so seriously, potential members of the U.S. team are chosen by instructors across the nation if they are deemed ready. The sisters' instructor, Eiji Toryu, endorsed their participation in the competition.

According to Akane Wakai, the forms event is a competition between two people in each preliminary round. The judges give a specific set of instructions for which movement to perform, and then decide the winner between the two. In the final round, a karateka performs the form of their choice, and is graded using a point system.

In competition sparring, the purpose is to apply karate techniques against an opponent in order to score points under certain regulations. These regulations determine valid techniques and target areas.

"Sparring didn't go as well as forms," Akane Wakai said. "I placed 7th in forms. For sparring, I went up against a Danish girl who was about six feet tall. She hit me in the face twice and that was really painful, actually. She didn't have much control."

Akane Wakai lost in the first round of sparring, but said it was a good experience for her months of practice.

"People had prepared me more timewise for sparring, and I felt—not bitter, but more disappointed that I got out in the first round. I couldn't do as much as people taught me," she said. "I cried a lot after the first round. I mean, it was painful, but it was also just that losing is tough."

Senior Akane Wakai (right) placed 7th in the forms competition at the Shoto Cup, an international karate competition in Japan.

According to Akane Wakai, after her loss, she was able to watch the adult division compete.

"Seeing that was even more incredible," she said. "It made me want to do it more and train harder."

Moe Wakai said she did not want to compete at first, but her sister and parents motivated her to participate after she was also endorsed by their instructor.

"If I were alone, I wouldn't have had the motivation I had with my sister doing it next to me. It got me motivated to compete," Moe Wakai said. "She usually trains next to me or around me. Whenever I'd catch a glimpse of her, she'd have a lower stance or a better something and I would try to imitate her. Sometimes it works, and sometimes it doesn't. She helped me to learn."

According to the Japan Karate Association, the goal of karate is not just to score points. Karate is also about developing balance within each athlete both mentally and physically. The idea of karate is that through rigorous training, athletes can also cultivate good character.

Yutaka Wakai, the father of the two sisters, attended the competition along with his wife to see his daughters compete.

"Their performances were great. We saw that they showed their strong spirits, had no fear, were not nervous, were enjoying the moment and were relaxed," he said. "We were glad to see that they showed good friendship and could also make some new friends during the tournament."

Yutaka Wakai said he and his wife were very proud of their daughters and were happy they felt so appreciative toward everyone who supported them along the way.

"This was a great opportunity for them to know their level in the world," Yutaka Wakai said. "We would like them to continue it as valuable mental discipline and to seek perfection of character."

According to Akane Wakai, she was able to learn more about her sport by interacting with the members of other teams, such as the Japanese international team.

"They are so amazing. The best way to describe it would be breathtaking. That's the kind of karate that I'd like to pursue," Akane Wakai said. "We got to bond because we had karate, this shared interest. Once we were on the mats, we were opponents, but after that we were just teenagers."

An estimated 311,000 people marched near New York City's Central Park on Sept. 21 to protest against climate change.

The rally was scheduled during a United Nations Summit in which many of the world's leaders came to discuss the climate crisis. According to a Climate March website, the goal was to "change the heart and mind of the American people, our elected leaders and people across the world to act now to address the climate crisis."

Over a dozen members of the high school community participated. Senior Jacob Sanditen said he attended the march to learn and to advocate for the reduction of global warming.

"We learn about marches against stuff in school, and I wanted be be able to do something like that," Sanditen said. "Also, I thought it was a good way to start doing and learning more about different causes in the world today."

A personal account:

As my friend and I walked down the New York streets toward the beginning of the march, we kept on running into more people holding huge posters declaring that they wanted action. At some point, my friend and I turned to each other, and said in unison, "Wow, this is big."

When I decided to go to the People's Climate March, I wasn't exactly sure what I had signed up for. The website claimed that it would be the biggest climate march in history, but I didn't really believe it. The Facebook event only had around 20,000 people. To be honest, my friends and I were just going for fun. We liked the idea of going by ourselves to New York City for a weekend, and the thought of protesting and standing up for our rights was an added bonus.

What I actually experienced at the March was more than I could have expected. Sure, it wasn't always fun. We spent over an hour cramped next to cranky people, waiting to start moving. But the fact that it took so long meant that we were really part of something amazing. More than 300,000 people showed up- triple the amount that the organizers were expecting.

I saw people of all races and all ages. There were the toddlers in strollers marching next to college students, marching next to the original hippies. There were people representing every type of organization, and advocating for different issues, all in the spectrum of climate.

Many posters urged people to consider veganism. Others talked about fracking, and others were anti nuclear-power. One group carried a huge balloon, like something you'd expect to see in the Macy's parade, in the shape of a missile. People dressed up as mermaids and held a huge banner that said "We have solutions."

The highlight of the day came at 12:58, when we were still waiting to move. People started quieting down, and suddenly everything was completely silent. I'm still amazed that they managed to silence 300,000 people spanning 30 blocks. Following other people's lead, we held up our hands and put our hands down, to acknowledge those who were already lost to climate change. I heard someone say, "hands up, don't shoot," connecting this march to the events in Ferguson, MO.

Then, just as suddenly, we heard and felt a roar of cheers from in front of us growing louder and louder. Soon, the wave had passed through us, and we were left with it's energy.

At the end of the march, as we sat down to rest our feet, we watched a screen that showed marches all over the world. We saw people in Kathmandu, Rome, Barcelona and Berlin, all against climate change. It was inspiring and empowering to see people from all over the world coming together to voice their concern. By looking at the news, it seems that our voice was heard. I came back to Brookline, with optimism about the future of our climate and with motivation to take shorter showers.

RACE

Not just black and white

IZZY MEYERS
Arts Editor

As an Asian female who has experienced both ignorance and outright prejudice regarding my race, I am often impressed by everything Brookline has done to try to improve race relations both locally and nationally. Most importantly, I feel lucky that we know there is still a lot of work to do.

With the recent murders of young people of color in Ferguson, Staten Island and countless other places, the staggering injustice that people of color face in America is finally becoming obvious to the masses.

I want everyone to realize the stark differences between treatment of Whites and people of color. I want this inequality to be the top stories of news broadcasts and the front pages of magazines. I just do not want it made only Black and White.

Oftentimes race is something typically looked at under binary terms; either you benefit from the system or you don't. You are always the oppressor or the oppressed, and there is no middle ground.

An article used to demonstrate the advantages that come with being white, "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Backpack" by Peggy McIntosh, left me more confused once I had finished reading it than before.

Being Asian, I tick off approximately half of the points in her article. When shopping, I am never assumed to be shoplifting. But I have yet to see people of my skin color well represented in Hollywood. I am frequently made the poster child for my race, yet I have little reason to think the police will target me based on my skin color. "Flesh colored" Band-Aids only match my skin in the wintertime.

Needless to say, there is no "guide" included to find out which race you are based on how many privileges you check off. I am left somewhere in the grey area between white and black, with no tangible way of resolving to which side I ultimately fall, if any. When people talk about students of color, I frequently wonder if they are actively including me in their wording, or if they do not really mean to be talking about my race at all.

I think about Native American, Latino, Middle Eastern, Pacific Islanders and other races that also reside in this grey area, and whether they also wonder if the prejudices they face daily are enough to validate their oppression. I personally struggle with this daily.

Has an anti-Asian joke stung so hard it brought tears to my eyes in the middle of gym class? Yes. Do I regularly see people of my race murdered for the color of their skin? No. Are the seemingly in-between races destined to hover in the ambiguous territory between oppressor and oppressed? I hope not; we need a third category.

When we say "students of color" we cannot look at the world as a checkerboard. Race is more than two boxes to jump between. When we really mean "African-American students" or "Black students" could we actually just say that? It is heartbreaking to think your race is being included in a category only to find out the speaker did not intend to address your concerns.

It is extremely important to discuss race relations between White and Black people. I cannot stress this enough. We need to spend time, and much more of it, focusing on the pressing issues between these two races in particular. But saying there are more racial problems than just ones between Black and White people should in no way diminish the importance of the relationship between those two ethnic groups.

I think we as a society need to be aware of this grey area. We need to acknowledge that many minorities are confined to this space and not often talked about, and that their oppression should never be tolerated.

Look away from this page for a moment. The world around us is more than just ink on paper; its inhabitants are more than just two contrasting colors. Let's acknowledge them all.

RE: White Privilege

Senior Mattie O'kelley-Bansberg speaks at the Race Day assembly 'Tell Your Story'. She explained that it is white people's duty to be actively against racism.

MATTIE O'KELLEY BANGSBERG
Contributing Writer

"That person who spoke first is wrong and racist."

"That was not the way to please a crowd."

"That girl is racist towards White people."

These are some of the criticisms I received from White people about my speech at the 'Tell Your Story' assembly on Race Day. I get it; nobody wants to be called racist. I hope this article will clarify my message. If you are White, you benefit from systemic racism, but that does not mean you are a bad person.

There is a difference between active, passive and anti-racism. Beverly Daniel Tatum differentiates the three with a moving walkway metaphor. Active racists walk quickly forward, passive racists stand idly by and anti-racists walk against the conveyor belt.

The vast majority of White students at the high school are passively racist. The system of racism carries us forward, and we become racist merely by existing in an unfair world. By standing still on the moving walkway, we benefit inadvertently from racism. We breathe the racist "smog" and we develop racial prejudices, but we rarely think or talk about racism, so we cannot see how we are contributing to it.

If you are White, you are born onto this moving walkway. You are born with prejudice, and you are born with systemic power. This is the definition of racism.

If you are still convinced you have no racial prejudice, I encourage you to take Harvard's online Implicit Bias Test. If you do not believe that your skin color grants you systemic power, consider this: a recent study showed that although White students constitute 59.8 percent of the high school, we account for only 30.3 percent of out-of-school suspensions. We are not inherently better behaved than any other race, so what accounts for this discrepancy?

People's perceptions of us become our realities. Everyone has prejudices, but what we do not realize is how deeply these prejudices shape who others become.

As a White person from a well-educated, high income family, I am expected to achieve academically. Teachers started tracking me into advanced groups starting in 3rd grade. Now, in my senior year, I see only White and Asian students in my Advanced Placement Calculus class.

My skin color does not make me smarter than anyone else, but it has placed me here. I have an unfair advantage: White privilege.

So why is there not a single Black, Latino, or indigenous student in my math class? A 3rd grade teacher probably tracked her into a lower group. If people do not expect her to succeed in advanced courses, it is harder for her to believe she can.

Implicit biases are real. White people are not smarter or better behaved than any other race, but because people expect us to be, we are more likely to be tracked into advanced courses and less likely to be disciplined than people of color.

So whose fault is it? Is it our teachers'? Our peers'? Our families'? It has been hard to confront the concept of racism: I was born into a system that gives me unearned power because of my white skin color, and I have no choice about it.

The only way I can wrap my head around this is to remind myself that it is no single person's fault. The world molds us. We did not invent racism, but ending it is our responsibility.

I am not an expert on White privilege. I am racist and I have prejudices too. But if anything I have said or written rings true to you, I challenge you to do something about it:

-Ask a librarian for a book recommendation about White privilege.
-Participate in Racial Reconciliation, a program designed to bring together youth of Color and White youth to discuss, expose and address structural racism at its roots.
-Come to Race Committee: Thursdays, 2nd lunch, in room 406.
-Take Identity, Race and Literature Honor as a School Within a School English class next year.
-Come to monthly Race Reels movie nights.
-Read Peggy McIntosh's "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Knapsack."
-After reading, bring up White privilege and racism to your White friends and family.

We are born onto the "moving walkway," but we each have the power to decide whether to walk forward, passively stand by or walk against the conveyor belt of racism.

WHERE does our WASTE go?

WRITTEN BY LOUIE GOLDSMITH

Thrown Away

Trash and recycling are thrown into bins around the school.

Moved

Every day after school, the custodians move the contents of the bins to one of two compactors. One is located on Lowell Road, and the other is next to the Unified Arts Building.

TRASH

Pickup

On Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays between 7 a.m. and 7:45 a.m., the town's trucks pick up the trash from the compactors.

Sanitation Department

The trash is brought to the Sanitation Department near Skyline Field, where it is weighed. Two different contractors, Covanta Haverhill Inc. and Casella Resource Solutions, pick up the trash.

Covanta

At the Covanta facility in Rochester, Massachusetts, the trash is burned and the steam provides energy for the Buzzard's Bay region.

Southbridge Landfill

Casella brings the trash to a landfill in Southbridge, Massachusetts. The gas extracted from the trash helps power the surrounding community.

RECYCLING

Think Green,
Think Clean.

Pickup

On Mondays and Wednesdays between 9 a.m. and 1 p.m., Waste Management trucks pick up the recycling in front of the Schluntz Gymnasium.

To the Plant

The trucks bring the recycling to the Waste Management plant in Avon, Massachusetts. At the plant, it is divided up into different categories such as glass, paper and cardboard. The types of recycling are sold to different markets where they will have a second life. For example, used car tires are sold to companies who grind them up to create playgrounds.

Dear Seniors,

On behalf of Ms. Thomas, Mr. Poon, Ms. Herz, Ms. Lindor, Ms. Whelan, Mr. Schiff and Ms. McIntosh, I wish you the best of possible continuations in your adventures after Brookline High. We remember you as cute little freshmen - all braces, giggles and gangly limbs - and now you have become adults. You seem very ready to leave us and we wish you the very best in whatever endeavors you will undertake. We will miss your unique energy and talents, and we will be reminiscing about what you have accomplished for many years. Please think of BHS as your second home so that whenever you are around you will feel free to come back and visit us. Best of luck in the future and be sure to let us know of all your new exploits as you go out into the world!

You are --
Compassionate, smart, silly, lots of fun to be with, a loving friend, trustworthy, fair, observant, honest, and responsible -- and passionate about teaching children. You will be great!
Your loving and so, so proud, Mom & Dad

Erin X. Frederick

Don't lose your chance of knowing...what's around the river bend. All your dreams extend....just around the river bend.

Off you go to realize your dreams, Erin -- we're so proud of you!

Love, Dad, Mom, and Conor

Nikita Budnik

There are few things more touching to a parent than their child graduating from school. It is one of those events that will be remembered forever. Now our eldest, who was so recently a first grader, has the whole world open to him.

Good luck Nikita !!!

Eva

We are so grateful and proud of the person you are.... No matter how far or how close you go, your inner voice will always be home, and we'll always be there loving you.

"There is no one alive who is youer than you.... You have brains in your head, you have feet in your shoes. You can steer yourself, any direction you choose" Dr. Seuss
